Public Information and Policy Research

Total Worldwide Public Information and Policy Research Contributions in 2001 were $5.7 million. Funds were assigned to support organizations that address policy alternatives in a balanced, objective, and methodologically sound manner.

The company is interested in encouraging attention to issues of direct relevance to business and to ExxonMobil's ongoing operations. Areas addressed include those that impact foreign relations, international business operations, national laws and regulations, and states or local communities where ExxonMobil has a significant presence or interest. The company is particularly supportive of policy organizations which study issues of direct relevance to the petroleum and petrochemical industries and the role of private businesses and market forces in contributing to the resolution of public issues. Accordingly, the areas addressed are:

- Research and commentary on key public policy issues. ExxonMobil supports programs, via think tanks, universities, associations and business councils, whose intent is to increase the United States' knowledge of the world and contribute ideas towards shaping U.S. foreign policy. We support the Council on Foreign Relations to help them promote constructive discussions both in private and in public, and to publish Foreign Affairs, the leading journal on global issues.

- Innovative policy ideas that emphasize market forces. ExxonMobil seeks organizations that are dedicated to research and to provide free market solutions to today's public policy problems. These organizations not only produce ground breaking research on free market policy but are actively involved in communicating the public policy debate not only to policy makers but also the media and public. The American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research and the Competitive Enterprise Institute, organizations dedicated to strengthening the foundations of freedom and to the principles of free enterprise, receive support from ExxonMobil.

- General work that has a market-oriented approach. Through various memberships or affiliations, ExxonMobil is able to support the promotion of business views and solutions on a wide range of global economic and business policy issues. We support the United States Council for International Business, International Chamber of Commerce and the National Foreign Trade Council to obtain business-critical information about international policy and regulatory issues.

- Research and relationships on countries where ExxonMobil does business. To increase understanding by the people of the United States about the societies and the cultures of the world, in which ExxonMobil does business, we support a variety of programs focused on both cultural affairs and public policy programs. The Asia Society and the Corporate Council on Africa are examples of organizations currently funded by ExxonMobil.
